Bachelor of Science in Justice Studies

Discover the inner workings and examine the broad scope of the American justice system through the SNHU's Justice Studies program, available online. Unlike programs that focus on only one aspect of the justice model, such as criminal justice, the SNHU program provides a comprehensive study of the justice system, including law enforcement, criminal law, corrections systems, legal and social science research and more.

From certificates to an Associate's degree to a Bachelor of Science, students tailor the program according to their career goals. Students will take courses in policing and law enforcement, crime and criminology, and law and legal processes. In light of the professional nature of the justice system, students also are encouraged to explore courses in such aligned areas as business, psychology, sociology, information technology and political science.

Course work

Students may complete their tailored program at their own pace, fitting online coursework into their busy schedules. Bachelor's students may concentrate in a specific area of the Justice Studies program or tailor the coursework to fit specific aspirations and interests. Associate's degree students will get a deep understanding of the broad field of justice. Certificate programs are available as well, enabling students to focus solely on their area of interest.

Certificates and Bachelor's degree concentrations are available in:

- Policing and Law Enforcement
- Crime and Criminology
- Terrorism and Homeland Security
- Law and Legal Process
